How the Golden Mountain brought the people happiness.

Once upon a time there was a king who ruled his kingdom so harshly that Goodness and Warmth fled away. So it grew colder and colder. Soon the entire kingdom was covered by a thick blanket of snow and ice. And with the coming of the snow and ice, the memory of happy days was wiped out – as if they had never been.

This suited the king very well. He needed hard-working subjects, not happy ones. But the king's daughter missed joy and laughing so much that her heart was almost torn asunder with sorrow. So she set out with her knapsack to seek a certain mountain which she had been told would bring people happiness.

For many hours the princess wandered through fields and meadows, and through valleys and forests, until she saw a golden shimmer. She followed the light, climbing higher and higher, and started to grow so deliciously warm that she soon peeled off her gloves, her woollen hat, and finally her heavy cloak. Once again, she felt as if her heart would burst. But this time it was because she was laughing so much, with a sound as clear as a thousand tiny bells.

“If only I could let all of the people in our kingdom share this wondrous feeling,” the king's daughter thought. “What a noble reason for visiting me,” answered a voice which came from deep inside the Golden Mountain. “But take comfort, my child. I am willing to share my endless bounty with you. Here, take this bundle of light and carry it back down to the ice-bound cottages with my message.”

The king's daughter did as she was bidden. Soon men, women and children were all flocking towards the radiantly alluring light.

The king's subjects cared as little about his displeasure as did the Golden Mountain itself. And since its magical powers are endless, they must be working still.

How to get to the Golden Mountain, based on notes made by the king's clever daughter
